The World Bank's loan to Pakistan was never intended to be used for security purposes, but the money has instead gone to the country's military-industrial complex, the US has said. The US government has filed a lawsuit against Pakistan, alleging that the country's military used the funds from a World Bank loan for "illicit activities". On September 4, the US Treasury Department announced it would ban American businesses from transferring any money to Pakistan's military. The nation's

US central bank imposed a similar ban on September 5. "The World Bank is committed to delivering economic development that is inclusive and beneficial to all. Its programmes are expected to benefit the poor and vulnerable and are not intended to benefit individuals or entities outside the government," the World Bank said in a statement. The $675m ($543m) loan for the country's energy sector was first made in the mid-2000s, according to the Washington Post. Pakistan's military has received more than $33bn in aid from the US over the last two decades. The Washington Post reported that Pakistan's military had used the money to purchase billions of dollars' worth of equipment, including fighter jets and tanks. The military also built a fleet of warehouses near the capital of Islamabad for storing its weapons. It was unclear if the US lawsuit would result in additional loan restrictions for Pakistan, or if the bank would now start. auditing its portfolio to make sure it is not being used for military purposes. Pakistan's government has repeatedly denied the allegations. It has argued that the country's economy is facing challenges because of internal problems and not because of foreign aid. 'Unwarranted interference' The US government has warned that the military will be hit with sanctions if it continues to use World Bank funds for corruption. The country's central bank and the US Treasury Department have imposed sanctions on a number of individuals and organisations over the last several years. The Post reported that the latest restrictions target Al Jazeera's TV channel and various companies and individuals. "We
