there is a log that show it was loading (progress bar) of.. As you see it is impossible to guess the private key in the given biometric hash. I would like to be able to send the private key at least to the programmer, so the programmer can then decrypt and create the encrypted key with it. Does anybody know of a good way to send the private key to the programmer? A: Any such private key you want to distribute is likely to be unsuitable for your application. The problem here is the interaction with the random oracle, a significant part of which comes from your operating system. It is just not feasible to keep the key secret, but then you cannot trust anything that your operating system does with it. In fact, in almost any real-world case, the operating system is in a much better position than the user to keep the key secret. Instead, you should use the keys that are pre-generated for you, and only distribute them in a way that will prevent the developer from reading them. This is typically done by simply sending the developer the key file, and leaving the app to generate the key itself. In particular, if you do this, you are not bound to use a product that comes from a particular vendor, and there should be no need to comply with any kind of specific CA requirements. Simply deliver the key file and let the developer run it.

If you want to be extra-sure that the key file was not tampered with, stick to something like the public key system, where it is the developer who has to be sure that the key matches. Without going into too much detail, there is no way around that your system will use operating system-specific features. It should be
