Kindle Customer Reviews, Most developers use plain Javascript, and there is nothing wrong with that. How we hooking things in Redux is a big part of a typical React development. However, it is often annoying that you need to add a new small piece of code in every component. Writing small Redux actions handlers may be an answer. Let's assume we have some ActionCreator named createUser :
`// src/create_user.js export function createUser({ data }) { console.log(data) }` This action will create a new user on the server. On the client side, a typical usage of such an action handler is to create a user in a stateful component: `// src/component.js import { createUser } from '../actions/create_user'`
`export default class App extends Component { state = { user: null } constructor(props) { super(props) this.handleCreateUser = this.handleCreateUser.bind(this) } handleCreateUser(data) { this.setState({ user: data }) } render() { return () } }` Now whenever an action creator creates a new user it will be automatically handled by the component. There is nothing wrong with that, but I guess most developers will prefer a quick solution. This quick and dirty quick solution is simply attaching an action creator to Redux: `// src/redux.js import { createUser } from '../actions/create_user' import { createStore } from 'redux' const store = createStore(() => ({})) export default { create`
