I wouldn't be surprised if the chief of emergency medicine was called in to clear a nurse from duty. For example, if a child has an accident, an adult may jump in and assist until the medical professional arrives. However, if a child has a virus, or a disease, then the adult may NOT jump in and may cause further damage. I use this system and love it. LOL The best way to use this system is to have a "parental consent form". Parents of the little kids have to sign something in front of a witness (or notarized) to give permission for the parents/guardians to consent to "any medical actions" (a blanket consent). This way you don't have to worry if a family member gets consent when it doesn't have to be. Once you get consent, you can easily consent for other family members. This is very simple to do, especially if you are not in a hurry and you have plenty of time to do it right. I do this and it works great. I had my wife's mother sign a consent for her before going to a meeting about a potential hip operation. I then asked her to consent for her in case something went wrong and she would need my help. LOL I am a nurse and this is very important to me. This will make sure that if something were to go wrong, your family members can have a medical professional assist you. This would not be possible without parental consent. However, as I said, this is more important for the little kids. I have one of my friends who was there when her baby was born. She was in the delivery room when her mother gave permission. After giving birth, she signed for her mother and father before they left the room. This is just one example of why parental consent is very important. The system makes sure that you only have permission to consent. Unless you have a clear record of the adult's consent, then you don't have permission to consent. I have had cases in which the family members signed, but they don't know what they were consenting to. It's better to have the full consent written down rather than just verbal consent. This way you have a written record of what you consent to, which you can be sure
