Petersburg Life cycle assessment of organic waste treatment options: the case of wastewater treatment plants.

The main aim of this study was to assess the environmental impacts of the organic matter that remains after wastewater treatment (WWT), for different treatment options and/or different materials that are used to treat wastewater: activated sludge, stabilized WWT, and trickling filters. In order to do this, two case studies were analyzed: (i) a real situation (an urban wastewater treatment plant); and (ii) a hypothetical situation (a hypothetical wastewater treatment plant with a hypothetical use of activated sludge). For both cases, a methodology was applied, based on life cycle assessment (LCA), which compared different treatment options and materials using different impact categories (intended to represent specific environmental problems). The results of the methodology showed that direct disposal of the organic residues from wastewater treatment, without any subsequent treatment (either thermal or composting), has the lowest environmental impacts, where the organic matter is treated at a relatively low temperature. The highest environmental
