In the video below, EA Sports Director of Studio Entertainment Eric Chahi explains how he used both the real-life player motion capture and playing player data to create the game's motion-controlled ball physics. Watch the full interview: "We have developed a dedicated motion capture studio in Frankfurt, Germany," explains Chahi. "The initial goal was to create a feeling of speed around the player, but initially we did not want the ball to move too quickly. We have developed our sensors and physics system over two and a half years. We made a lot of progress in FIFA 13, and we were able to really upgrade our physics and ball movement in FIFA 14, so there was less compromise when we began work on FIFA 15. But with more complicated gameplay in the game, we feel we have to be more explicit with our physics." Chahi explained that FIFA 16 was a good point to start adding new animations and physics to the game. "We did a lot of things more subtly. Now we have better speed on the ball, better deceleration, better recovery, better feel and timing. And what we are working on now is to have a lot more character in the ball physics." Chahi said he wanted to make the ball feel more "realistic." "You need to have different kinds of motion on the ball: a slow cut pass, a fast counter-attack ball, a change of speed in a game, but we need more variety. This is something we have been working on recently and have been improving on for the last few years. The ball has to fly, be a mess, be a calm and nice ball and be hard to catch. That means the deceleration of the ball has to be correctly controlled. So we developed a new ball deceleration system which could be better than the one we used in the past." Chahi also talked about making the ball feel more "organic." "We increased the weight of the ball to make the ball feel like a real, hard ball. We also made the ball spin when it is shot, we added more unpredictability on the back-spin, side-spin and front-spin, and we can control the maximum speed of the ball. We also introduced a different type of spin depending on the match situation: the game starts with a high-speed, low-spin ball, but when the
