OkTubular cells mediate placental transport of alectinib in rats. Although oral administration of active agents into the mammary gland of female animals has been frequently described, such delivery has rarely been reported in pregnant animals. The objective of this study was to assess whether the placenta can serve as a sink for a systemic active agent administered via the mammary gland. Rats were intravenously injected with alectinib (alectinib is an irreversible, selective anaplastic lymphoma kinase (ALK) inhibitor that has previously shown rapid and efficient delivery to the brain after oral administration) and plasma alectinib concentrations were measured using ultra-high-performance liquid chromatography-tandem mass spectrometry. Alectinib concentrations in the plasma of dams were significantly higher at one hour and at five hours after oral administration of alectinib, compared with concentrations at the baseline. In pregnant rats, after oral alectinib administration, alectinib concentrations in the plasma of dams were significantly higher at one hour and at five hours after oral administration, compared with concentrations at the baseline. In pregnant rats, alectinib concentrations in the plasma of the fetuses were significantly higher at one hour after oral alectinib administration. These findings suggest that the placental transfer of alectinib occurs via the mammary gland and that the placenta acts as a sink for alectinib, and that the presence of tubular cells in the placenta might contribute to the placental transfer of alectinib.
