Light sources can be used for a variety of applications, such as, for example, illumination, data display, optical communications, and the like. One popular type of light source is a light emitting diode (LED). LEDs generally include one or more active layers of semiconductor material sandwiched between oppositely doped layers. When a bias is applied across the doped layers, holes and electrons are injected into the active layer where they recombine to generate light. Light is emitted from the active layer and from all surfaces of the LED. In an LED, generally, at least one current feed is used to provide electricity to the active layers. The current feed passes electrons from one or more power supplies to the active layers. A current feed can be a series of wires, a p-n junction, or other current conduction device. The current feed uses the current flow to provide the electrical energy. Some current feeds pass a significant amount of electrical current through the current feed to the active layers. For example, in LEDs that emit blue or green light, the current feeds can pass up to 1 mA of current. In some LEDs that emit red or amber light, the current feeds can pass

How could such a thing happen? Follow the key players as they methodically rearranged the map of the world. In their wake they left a trail of wreckage and havoc across the globe, including a procession of cataclysmic wars, the rise of fascism and nazism, and the extinction of more than 100 million lives. By the century's end, few of the nations of the former empire of Europe could boast a democratic, representative government, and a nation as vital as the United States had been forged into a global superpower. Here are the events, the personalities, the events themselves—as Harlow puts it: "What a century we have had!"—and the context for the twentieth century: the upheaval of World War I, the Russian Revolution, and the two world wars; the rise of mass politics and popular culture; the
