Related Post: Pyruvate and lactate metabolism in the brain in humans: III. Plasma pyruvate and lactate in neurological disorders. The concentrations of pyruvate and lactate in the cerebrospinal fluid have been analyzed in a number of disorders affecting the central nervous system. The concentration of pyruvate was raised and lactate was decreased in disorders with a mainly active degenerative process, e.g. multiple sclerosis, spinal cord trauma and progressive spinal ataxia, and increased in disorders with a neurogenic process as e.g. epilepsy or acute brain injury. The concentration of lactate was generally lower than that of pyruvate.

Pyruvate and lactate values were not affected by treatment. The pyruvate-to-lactate ratio was in the normal range in most patients. The concentration of pyruvate in the cerebrospinal fluid was not correlated to the clinical and pathological disturbances, but was related to the concentrations in the blood and/or in the cerebral white matter. The pyruvate-to-lactate ratio was increased in patients with pyramidal tract signs as an indication of a potential lactate production in the white matter as well as in those without pyramidal tract signs. The present results demonstrate that either an increased plasma pyruvate or a decreased plasma lactate in patients suffering from disorders of the central nervous system may be indicative of disturbances of brain metabolism. The pyruvate-to-lactate ratio can be expected to be increased if an increased lactate production rather than a disturbed py
