The NSA has been trying to break Tor's encryption and to unmask its users since 2001, according to a new article in the New Yorker, and the agency has spent millions of dollars in an effort to do so. But while they may have perfected the art of code-breaking back then, they have been getting worse at it — rather than better — since then. The NSA's use of so-called "eavesdropping" for its "signals intelligence" (or SIGINT) operations, the New Yorker writes, "has made the NSA an inherently slow, sloppy, and inefficient organization." In turn, that has given the agency its lack of success in breaking Tor's encryption. NSA agents were never able to penetrate the anonymity of Tor. They did, however, have a fairly high rate of success cracking other providers, the report says. For example, the NSA was able to crack 25 percent of the encryption of Yahoo! using a combination of high-frequency acoustic collection of email and the NSA's own software for code-breaking. But the agency was less successful at cracking Skype, which used a different encryption algorithm. The NSA denied the allegations in the New Yorker story in a statement: "The [New York] article has a collection of miscellaneous 'facts,' with no 595f342e71
