In this weblog, archivist, researcher and writer Stephen Knight chronicles the strange history of Australia's role in the Pacific War. For Part 1, please go to The Australia-Japan War: Prelude to Pearl Harbour. Refugees, allowed to return home, warn of 'unrest' as more war debris hits their world ST LEON, France — A woman with the eye-watering title of "Daughter of the French-Australian War" — the first thing one meets in this seaside town where history first came to the beaches where so many men died to protect the Normandy landing beaches — cradles her son in her arms and smiles. "There was so much aggression when we left the island," she says, her voice arch and sombre. "It made us flee for our lives. If I could do it again, I would have begged to stay. "Of course, I learned a lot about our history," she adds. "I learned a lot about Australia. I know how this country works, how it thinks, how it works around the world. I know about the people and I saw their faces, their kids — they are our children, too. They are all over the world." All of them refugees, those who had to flee the bloody beaches and the torture of war, who came home and now live in France, who no longer wish to keep the memories of their harrowing escape out of sight, out of mind. The Vietnam War made them leave the shores that as many as 40,000 men and women died protecting. And now, as the launch of the world's biggest expedition to recover war debris from the site of the 2003 invasion of Iraq approaches, there are warnings d0c515b9f4
