I was wondering if an antimatter particle can have a positive charge? Does their energy state differ from what we think they have? A: Even antimatter would need to have a net negative charge, since that is the condition of having the electrons to be bound together with positive charge. The problem being that the net protons will have a positive charge of  $-1$ , canceling the net charge. If the total charges of two particles are the same, they are said to be identical. The net charge of the universe is zero, a feature known as charge conservation. If the electron is  $+1$  and the positron is  $-1$ , the net charge of this system would be  $-1$ .
