Review: Better Together by Dana Cox Review: Better Together by Dana Cox This was published in the Cricketer Oct/Nov 2009 Review: Better Together by Dana Cox Five stars are at a premium these days, so it comes as no great surprise that it took me quite a while to get round to reading the latest contribution from experienced crime writer Dana Cox. Cox is the author of two previous hardback crime thrillers in the Agatha Christie/MI6/West End Forsythe style – The Judas Club and The Forsythe Saga (obviously not the same Agatha Christie books, but similar authors). Having spent some time doing The Thing, I thought I'd read this and the above mentioned books before considering his newest offering – even though it is by far the most prestigious publication I've come across so far this year. Better Together is the 11th in the series but, like many of Cox's previous books, it doesn't feature any of the familiar characters from the previous books. It's the story of Prof. Freeman and his investigations into the mobsters who have taken over the construction of the Tindall Trust subway tunnels. The first of these books is based on similar events in the 1960s, with a second book dealing with the events of the 1970s. The crucial point of this action is the events of 1981. Prof. Freeman, then a university professor, comes across a newspaper piece about the time that Jackson Brogan, a mobster, was murdered by the Kingsley gang in the tunnels – at the time of his death. Prof. Freeman becomes obsessed with finding the evidence the newspaper piece alluded to and by the end of the book he is in the U.S., following a trail that takes him to a company that manufactures military ordnance. Prof. Freeman intends to use the ordnance to blow up the underground tunnels and thus destroy the Kingsley mob. Better Together has some nice characterisation, but the main characters are pretty well known from the two previous books. The research Cox has done is obviously very thorough – he even includes several footnotes, which
