The claim: The income gap between high earners and everyone else has continued to widen in the past year. Reality Check verdict: The income gap between high earners and everyone else has continued to widen in the past year, just as it has done in the past decades. The headlines in Britain have been dominated by tax hikes - such as the end of the "triple lock" promise of rising pay and benefits - and cuts in personal public spending plans such as day-care and freezing police numbers. But there are also big questions being asked about economic inequality. The Institute for Fiscal Studies, which looks at how the economy works in practice, says that the income gap between high earners and everyone else has widened. Why? The rise in wages and corporate profits have been higher than expected, meaning that UK households and businesses have enjoyed a rise in their disposable incomes after tax and other expenses. This in turn has meant that the tax burden has not risen as fast as expected, as earnings rise and more people pay income tax. If we look at the data more closely, we can see that the income gap between the highest earners and everyone else has not narrowed over the past year. How have income levels changed in the past year? The top 1% of earners, the highest earners in Britain's income pyramid, have seen their incomes rise faster than the bottom 90% of earners in the past year. What about wages? Older workers are struggling to keep pace with younger ones, as their wages have not been rising as fast as they did before the financial crisis. The headline rate of pay growth is still slightly above the previous peak in the early 1980s, when it rose by 3% annually, but at a lower pace than in 2008.

"Under a pseudonym I recently had to create a series of software products as a front for my own business. I engaged the services of a company that supplies professional writing services with a view to integrating their services into my own business. I received quality work from them and the best part of it all is that I could still continue doing what I do best, which is writing. The company was open and willing to work with me to create notes to meet my business needs. I never have to do it myself and it saves me a lot of time."
