Hurricane Imelda threatens US eastern seaboard Updated A tropical depression near Mexico's Yucatan Peninsula is strengthening into a tropical storm, and forecasters warn it could become a hurricane as it moves closer to the US. Key points: Tropical Storm Imelda is currently moving away from Mexico and is approaching Honduras Tropical Storm Imelda poses a threat to the US eastern seaboard and is forecast to reach hurricane strength later today It is not expected to hit land, but the storm is expected to bring a few inches of rainfall The storm is due to move slowly eastwards across Central America for the next few days, but the US National Hurricane Center (NHC) is warning it will pose a threat to the US east coast in the next few days. Late on Sunday, the NHC said a small area of low pressure, deep within the large and elongated tropical cyclone, was forming near the western coast of Mexico's Yucatan Peninsula. The agency says the system is weakening and will likely continue to move towards the north, and later to the east, this week. "A Hurricane Imelda watch is in effect for portions of the eastern coast of Mexico from Tulum northward to the Costa Rica coast," NHC forecaster William D'Andrea said. "Slow weakening or steady strengthening of Imelda is forecast during the next two days... Imelda is expected to reach hurricane strength... by late Monday." D'Andrea said Imelda was likely to be a hurricane-force storm by Tuesday morning when it moved past the west coast of Honduras. "Hurricane Imelda is expected to produce gusts near hurricane force when it makes landfall near Honduras late Tuesday or early Wednesday," he said. "The threat for heavy rainfall, coastal flooding and rough surf is also expected. "Imelda should remain well offshore and not affect any land along its path, although some scattered showers and perhaps even a drop or two of rain... are possible as it moves to the east.

Orr Says Obamacare Could Still Get Full Congressional Support TESTIMONIALS David and I have received unprecedented results from Orr's Top-Rated Laser Hair Removal Program, and would recommend that anyone experiencing hair loss or unwanted hair consider consulting him for treatment. We've been impressed by the results of his consultations, home and office visits. We have found him to be extremely professional, and knowledgeable about Laser Hair Removal. At our first appointment we were told he was familiar with a particularly difficult area and recommended it to us, even though he had never seen the area before. The area was not the first area where we had met with him, and he immediately diagnosed it and discussed ways of dealing with it and monitoring it. He arrived on time for the consultation. We were treated with respect and given honest answers to questions we asked, and we will most definitely return. —Richard & Brenda When we first became sick of the hives, we did not think that a steroid shot could clear up the problem, but after a friend recommended Larry Orr to us, we found that he was indeed very knowledgeable.
