Q: How do I view the contents of a textarea without displaying the text within? Assuming a textarea has been rendered in a DOM document. How do I view the rendered contents without display its contents? This is very similar to the previous question "How to view rendered contents of an html document in an iFrame" but in my case I am interested in displaying an iFrame, so the answer for that question doesn't provide a solution for this. A: Before any content is displayed in your page, the browser runs the HTML for the page through the DOM parser, then renders the resulting DOM tree. Once that is done it does not keep a full copy of the HTML in an interleaved representation. Each node in the DOM tree is only a representation of a portion of the HTML page. It's rather inefficient for most uses, except when you want to prove that something is the way it is supposed to be. Then, you will see the information that is appropriate for that view. If you want to see the HTML of an element, then you need to access the innerHTML attribute of that element. Then, you can do whatever you want with the contents of that text area, such as hide it, or submit it as a form.

Reversal learning and memory after traumatic brain injury. There is ample support that reactive structural plasticity occurs in the human brain following brain damage. Although there is evidence for structural rewiring that supports memory formation, the direct neurophysiological consequences of reactive structural changes, in particular, as they relate to memory formation, have not been systematically examined. In the present study, a model of hippocampal-dependent memory was examined following a contusion of the human hippocampus. In separate groups of subjects, posttraumatic amnesia (PTA) was induced by diffuse TBI, or patients with mild TBI without PTA were asked to rehearse written story material prior to a delayed-recall procedure. The results indicated that the PTA group showed a clear impairment of recall. In contrast, the mild TBI subjects, although showing a reduced level of recall, did not demonstrate a deficit in recall. In both groups, patients who were unable to rehearse displayed a level of performance similar to those patients who were able to rehearse the material prior to the delayed recall test. These findings suggest that a memory deficit following TBI is not always evident in all cases, and suggests that a 'relearning' task may be necessary

Q: How do I get my segmented control to follow the height of another view? I've got a segmented control that looks like this when you select it: And when I select the control, the background image gets grey and the view underneath me changes to some other view: As you can see the image that I'm using in that view takes the entire view and controls the height, but I don't want that segmented control to be the same size as the first image. I want it to extend from the bottom all the way down to the bottom of the other view. How can I do that? A: All you need to do is have the control have this style: Then assign the value for leading to 1.0. This adds some space to the control in the front. Then you can just use the regular segmented control height value to control how far it extends. Q:

LinearLayoutNotFoundException when calling root layout from fragment I'm getting a Caused by: java.lang.IllegalArgumentException: The following classes could not be found: android.support.v7.widget.AppCompatTextView I can not for the life of me figure out why.
