A manual probe, to be inserted in the crack to be measured, can be rotated along the crack to measure the maximum or minimum of the crack depth. Such probes have gilded contact pins with a minimum diameter of around 8 mm. A second, manually operated probe also enables measurements at specific angles. With both probes, the contact pins are spring-loaded and positioned with a slightly curved path on the outer side of the probe. The RMG 4015 has a depth resolution of 0.1 mm, and all measurements are displayed graphically and in binary code. Using the digital application "RMG App", the depth of the crack can be entered. Alternatively, a file of crack data can be transferred from the RMG 4015 to the instrument, which then automatically calculates the measured values based on the user-entered crack depth or crack angle. The RMG 4015 supports standard file formats such as CSV, Excel and Access. Device related operation is completed in an intuitive operating mode that makes field use easy for any person. The user simply has to place the probes into the crack and activate the handheld application. All values are displayed on the screen. If you are using a RTU product that requires a compressor to power it, no problem, crack and crevice should be easy and convenient. The compressor is often a good project for a parent or spouse. If your house is not so equipped, however, remember that the compressor can cost more than the pest treatment itself. Some compressors have high prices. Crack and crevice treatments are always good for cracks, crevices and holes of any type. The most obvious benefit is they go inside your structure. This makes it easy to control the population that may be located in such locations. But cracks and crevices can provide refuge for other pests. That's where your knowledge of the target pest comes into play. You can use that knowledge to help you decide how serious the pest infestation is and whether or not a crack and crevice application is the best tool for the task.
