Numerous studies have shown that video games are good for the health of players (e.g., Bavelier et al. 2005; Vohs 2006; Oei 2010; Löwgren 2010a, 2010b; Huber 2008, 2009; Bavelier and Green 2004; Csikszentmihalyi 2004). Studies with children showed that playing video games also has positive educational effects: Playing video games, like many other experiences, has the potential to provide children with a structured and structured world (Edworthy et al. 2010a, 2010b). This does not mean that other activities like reading are no longer useful, but rather that some activities, such as video games, can help children to achieve some goals. Further studies showed that those activities can be used to improve a wide range of school-related skills, including critical thinking, logic and time management (Edworthy et al. 2010a, 2010b). However, human beings are also rather rational beings that evaluate opportunities and opportunities themselves. This means that they not only want to accomplish certain goals in order to have rewards, but also want to avoid negative outcomes at the same time. The players suffer negative consequences from time to time, and experience such losses may create a short-term loss of interest in a game. If players are not careful when they lose, they can enter deep depression and even suicidal thoughts as described by a Canadian hospitalized teenage school shooter (Kavussanu and Güell 2008). Moral psychology can then partially explain why people stop playing a game. If the players are able to anticipate the losses and avoid them, they may continue playing (Nathan et al. 2001).
